

*IllusionLevel: Sor/Wiz 2Components: V, S, MCasting Time: 2 minutesRange: 5 feetTarget: A page of a book, scroll, or engraved inscription on any relatively flat surface you are gazing atDuration: 24 hours/levelSaving Throw: NoneSpell Resistance: No

This magic captures a perfect image of any page of a book, scroll or engraved inscription on any relatively flat surface you are gazing at during casting. The “page” can only be one side of a decorated surface, and the spell captures only what you see, and not any hidden writings. A written contract or message or spell can be read and cast from this floating, faintly-glowing (enough to read by, but not enough to blind any being or hamper sight) image by the caster only (everyone else sees a shimmering radiance of swirling chaos), which enables the caster to carry a copy of a scroll or one-page spell without risking the original.

However, the primary uses of this spell are to copy a message to convey it elsewhere, or to enable a caster to acquire an image that can travel to where the caster can copy it out physically (into a spellbook or blank scroll). Until that is done, or the spell expires, the spell slot occupied by a captured image of a page or scroll is unavailable to the caster for other magic use (though they can choose to “forget” the image to regain the spell slot, so it will be lost forever, just as if the spell expires before use can be made of the image). You can cast multiple versions of this spell if you have sufficient slots, and so carry illusory images of multiple pages for spellcasting or copying use.

Material Component: An eyelash from the caster; need not be fresh.